--In Progress:

Sharon and Karen: Disability, Sexuality, and Law in the 1980s Sharon Kowalski suffered a traumatic brain injury and significant cognitive decline as a result of a car accident. Because she and her lover, Karen Thompson, lacked legal recognition as a couple, Kowalski’s parents made major decisions about her care and excluded Thompson from her life for several years. Because of contemporary understandings of disability and hospital systems and rehabilitation medicine, Kowalski did not receive the care that would have allowed her to preserve all of the cognitive capacity she possessed immediately after the accident. This project joins the long-neglected study of lesbian feminism with disability, public policy, movements for social change, and courtroom law. It is a key, although forgotten, chapter in the history of the campaign for the recognition of same-sex unions in the United States.

Sex, Gender, Tyranny This work will build upon the histories of the Jim Crow South and Fascist Europe to argue that anti-democratic politics and sexual- and gender-regulatory politics have historically been integrally related to one another – as they have been in Putin’s Russia, Orban’s Hungary, and in contemporary anti-democratic politics in the United States.
